Mission Statement

To maximize warfighter performance and survivability through world-class aeromedical and environmental health research by delivering solutions to the field, the Fleet, and for the future.

Aeromedical Research Directorate

The Aeromedical Directorate conducts aerospace-relevant basic and applied research in the biomedical and behavioral sciences. Key areas of investigation include: spatial disorientation (SD), situational awareness, motion sickness, unusual acceleration environments, effects of altitude, sustained operations and fatigue, personnel selection, and visual and auditory sciences. Research efforts focus on the transition of products from our basic and applied research base to Navy Medicine, Naval Aviation, and other governmental and civilian customers. Recent and anticipated transitions include: validated aviation selection tests, novel training media to reduce SD mishaps, and new medications for motion sickness. Our lab boasts a unique set of man-rated acceleration devices used by NAMRU-Dayton researchers and international visiting scientists to maintain a technology base critical to Naval Aviation and other federal and non-federal aerospace customers.

Environmental Health Effects Directorate

The Environmental Health Effects Directorate conducts basic and applied research to assess the toxicity of chemicals and materials used in military operations that may affect our sailors and civilian populations. NAMRU-Dayton has the capability to study toxic effects of materials using both in vitro and in vivo systems and then use the data to assess risk using in silico (modeling) approaches. Our in vitro approaches provide key data on the cytotoxicity, mutagenicity, genotoxicity, and the mechanism of toxic action of these materials. We use animal systems to examine the toxicities of materials via various routes of exposure. Our inhalation capabilities are extensive, allowing for exposures to gases and vapors, aerosols, particulates, and nanoparticles, using both whole-body and nose-only inhalation chambers. Thus, we have the ability to assess the toxicities of chemicals and materials via various routes of exposure at the molecular, cellular, organ, and whole body levels. The results from these efforts have led to state-of-the-science health protective exposure standards for our military and civilian populations.
